You're not allowed to install any device that interferes with the deployment of the air bag.

Also not allowed to have a video screen less than a certain distance from the driver.

Also not allowed to display movies, etc., on any screen visible to the driver.

We have sane laws up here. Of course, the video I want to see is of his face as the airbag launches the iPad into it at 200 mph.

So after the lawsuits ("Apple is responsible - there was no warning not to attach it to the steering wheel") you'll have to prove you're more intelligent than a pet rock to buy one - and that should kill 90% of the iPad market.

You don't really need to look at the speedometer if you have a car with a manual transmission. Listen to the engine and keep track of what gear you are using.

No need for a fuel gauge either. You should know how much gas you have put into the tank, how much you car uses and how long you have traveled.

As he says at the end - it's much safer than other forms of driver distraction. Which is to say: it's a much safer way to kill yourself and others.

Joking aside, and driver distraction aside, this thing is illegal as all getout. I'm pretty sure that obscuring the dash (and things like, ya know, the speedometer) isn't permitted. Making the steering wheel harder to grip (and at the ol' 10 and 2 positions, no less) makes the vehicle harder to control. Putting a relatively heavy, knife-edged*, solid object right in front of the airbag is pretty brilliant, too. Ordinarily I'd just shrug my shoulders and say "ah well, natural selection at work," except there's a pretty good chance you'll take a few people out with you. I'm hoping that he means this as a joke.
